An Optimistic Start to 2012

As we begin another year we edge slowly towards a brighter future for the mortgage industry. While 2011 was a challenging year there were some positive movements, which we hope will continue into 2012.

The last few months of 2011 saw a gradual improvement to the market, with house prices beginning to increase. The Nationwide House Price Index reported that 9 out of the 13 regions saw house price increases in Q4 of 2011 and rose overall by 0.3%. It also reported that house prices increased by 1% throughout the whole of last year with the typical value of a home now being, £163,822.

So what can we expect in 2012? Worries around how effectively the Eurozone deals with its sovereign debt problems are still prevalent, however assuming a resolution can be found, the housing market should be resilient this year and continue its slow recovery.

The recent government housing initiatives should help to boost the first-time buyers' market and with the Bank of England Base Rate remaining at its low of 0.5%, many borrowers will continue to benefit from lower monthly mortgage payments and more attractive product rates.

At the end of 2011 we saw new entrants emerge into the buy-to-let lending market, which will have a positive impact in this market and will fuel much needed competition.

No doubt market recovery will be a gradual process but the positive indicators are there that things are improving and we can look optimistically at the year ahead.
